

Seven Abou

Seven, being a quite ambitious entrepreneur, started his career at the age of 17 selling cat themed t-shirts online from his mother's basement. Being very tech-savvy, his business was an instant hit, having sold thousands through his tremendous efforts in online advertising on Twitch and Deviantart. That success though, did not last as he made the sudden realisation that he did not have thousands of t-shirts in stock. Despite the dire situation, he persevered, spending countless days and nights hand drawing cats onto t-shirts, but in the end, he finally finished painting his final cat and shut down his online t-shirt store.

Exhausted, he slept for the larger part of a week, only coming to his senses on the sixth day. Thinking all his work was done here, he moved onto his next ambition: a calculus textbook for cats.

However, these days of peace did not last, as on the fourteenth day after his painting marathon, he received a letter in his mailbox. Now, what could this be? He said to himself as he carefully opened the letter and read the words "Demand Letter". After rushingly reading through this now half-crumpled letter, shock and fear filled his face. He slowly went back into his basement and stared at the pile of cat t-shirts in front of him; t-shirts that he forgot to ship off and those that lead him to being sued for fraud. He called his lawyers, but despite their best efforts, he was still fined $777 777 and because of that, he was forced out of the house.

Today, 2 years later at the age of 20, he made it out of his misery and is attending the University of Toronto. Because of his previous crimes, he remained relatively poor and is now living in a townhouse with 4 other students. Still having been scarred from the day he received that fated letter, he's relatively awkward and difficult to work with and only made friends with one of his roommates.

With our new app, Seven hopes to regain some sense of communication with his roommates. He also hopes to be able to not come home to a table filled with half-eaten donuts from his donut addicted roommate.

Dre Assi

Born on December 5th, 1979, Dre is a humble man. Being born in the early days of software development, he found a keen interest in making arcade games and on May 30th, 2001, he released his masterpiece: Amuu Gus. But... it didn't give him the fame he desired, and he still needed to work hard in developing his skills. In 2005, he started working on a sandbox game with his friend, while also working part time at McDonalds. This time, his work paid off, as the release of their game that they called Rooblox gained international fame and instantly made him tens of thousands.

During the great recession in 2008, he saw a decrease in sales and decided to sell his half of the company. Now, having accrued nearly a million dollars, he bought a two story semi-detached house in the suburbs for four hundred thousand and moved in with his wife and son. In his new life, he continued living his humble life, occasionally working to help with everyday costs, but overall he got to enjoy his suburban life.

That all came to an end when his son managed to get himself fined $777 777 for fraud, which he was forced to pay as his son's parent. Infuriated by this sudden plot twist in his life, he kicked out his son and started searching for ways to make a living. Seeing that his basement was now unoccupied, he sold off the pile of cat t-shirts that his son had and rented it out to two university students. He also found a job at Walmart, where he worked as a cashier for almost the entire day, which has resulted in a multitude of communication issues with his tenants as he's never home.

He's quite hopeful about our new app, as it'll finally give him a chance to know what is going on in his property. He has also grown quite annoyed at undone tasks such as taking out the trash, and hopes that with more coordination these things can get done.

Taylor Aite

Taylor started her career as a miner, working for the York Mining Company. She worked day and night, and although it wasn't the 1800s anymore, it was still tiring work. Tiresome, but also well paying. In a few decades, Taylor made quite a small fortune, and with the housing market still relatively cheap, she bought five houses and rented four of them out.

Now, at the age of 52, Taylor suffers from breathing problems caused during her time mining, and struggles to go from house to house. A few years ago, Taylor took an interest in this new thing called "Internet explorer" and has since spent most of her time using it. Her other interests have consisted mostly of browsing through Facebook and eating tacos.

Discovering the more features of the phone, Taylor wishes that our new app would make it easier for her to manage her properties. Countless times had she been called to her properties to settle disputes between tenants, as her unethical overcrowded approach to renting out her properties has led to a multitude of issues due to insufficient facilities to support her tenants, such as there being only one washroom in her house of 14.
